If you read the recent Forbes article, TikTok's 7 Highest Earning Stars then you know 'serious money' can mean seven-figures! The list details the TikTok stars who earned over a million dollars last year by posting short videos on the hugely popular social platform. At 1, Addison Rae Easterling earned a whopping $5 million last year.

With so many losing income due to coronavirus, people are looking for new revenue streams and earning potentials. Social media has become a revenue source for many by becoming a social influencer on Instagram, Twitter and Facebook. The fastest growing of these social apps is TikTok; Easterling and those on the list make it clear that you can absolutely make money from TikTok. In fact, there are TikTok money calculators that give you an estimate of how much money any public TikTok account makes. The question becomes, how do you make money, and at what cost?

Step 2: Post content that people want to watch. Like all social media platforms, you're only as good as your content. Being a social influencer, whether it's on Instagram, Twitter or TikTok requires a lot of work. Your content must be fresh, interesting, unique and updated. This means multiple new videos, every day.

Once you have achieved large scale popularity on TikTok, you can start to earn real money. Below are 5 ways to earn that income:

Influencer Marketing. You've probably heard this before, and it's similar on all social platforms. The company hires influencers to use their videos to promote their products/services/brand, in hopes of generating sales. One of the biggest influencer campaigns on TikTok has been Mucinex, which worked with several influencers to promote its product in the time between Halloween and flu season. In the various videos, influencers wake up looking like goofy zombies. Then, they grab Mucinex. After that, the videos cut to the influencers looking fabulous and dressed for the club. The idea is that Mucinex can help you recover in time for a weekend party, even if you feel like death.
