While you know your hand in this case, 12 or 13 you only know one of the dealer's cards, his upcard.

Given that his facedown card is most likely to be valued a ten since tens, jacks, queens, and kings are all that value, then we can guess his most likely starting hand.

When armed with this information, it is prudent for a player to stand on anything as low as 12.

One way to do this is to split when you have a pair.

Beginners might be tempted to always split tens since it is possible they could make a blackjack or at least have two high finishing hands.

This is not so much about blackjack tricks, but about commonsense that will improve your overall game.

Lastly, stay cool.
