of luck.

There is more than one right play.

True, at times, there are several plays that are close, but most of the time there is one play that is superior to all others.

If you give up just 3 or 4% equity on a play (which is less than a blunder) it's truly not that big a deal, but if you do it just three or four times in one game, you add it up and you've given up a lot of your winning chances.

They are wrong.

When you are playing online, the dice are random, and no program has ever been invented that can look at your position and decide, consciously, what roll would hurt you most.

It is true that playing experience is essential to improve your game, but you will never be a great, or even really good player without study away from the board.

I believe it is possible to become an intermediate level player if you are very smart, have excellent math and gaming skills and great instincts, but I have never met an Open Level player (that is the top level tournaments) that didn't also do quite a bit of reading and study to learn the finer points of the game.
