Along with the purity and quality of their glass, Baccarat crystal makers can boast a remarkable fluency with a range of design styles - from cut-glass neoclassical pieces to sinuously etched Art Nouveau designs.

Baccarat began as a kind of industrial development project.

In 1764, the Bishop of Metz and other landowners in heavily forested northeastern France persuaded Louis XV to sanction a glassworks in the area - timber being a key resource required for the furnaces used in glass production.

In its early years the company produced humble products such as window panes and simple drinking vessels.

In 1816 a new owner began making crystal, and seven years later Louis XVIII - who had taken the throne after the defeat of Napoleon - gave Baccarat its first royal commission, for tableware.

In ensuing years, an estimated one third of the company’s workforce was dedicated to commissions to the Russian imperial court alone.

Spurred by the intense competition between global industries in the latter 19th century - fought in public view in the many world expositions of the era - Baccarat elevated its level of artistry by adopting new technologies and creating a rigorous training program.

But as you will see from the offerings on 1stDibs, Baccarat has items to suit any taste.
